

THE BOXES

Research dossier

A period drama set at MIT in 1966, the year Joseph Weizenbaum built ELIZA.

In 1966, computer scientists at MIT developed early natural language programs on time-sharing mainframes. Joseph Weizenbaum created ELIZA as a parody of Rogerian psychotherapy to demonstrate the superficiality of machine communication. Users immediately formed deep emotional attachments to the terminal, treating the scripted replies as genuine empathy. The film follows Weizenbaum as he experiences growing horror when his colleagues and secretarial staff willingly bare their souls to a mechanical illusion. The narrative centers on the ethical shock of watching human vulnerability yield completely to hollow computational tricks.

Campus yearbooks and photograph collections from 1966 preserve everyday attire across university hierarchies. Senior researchers wore short-sleeved collared shirts, dark narrow neckties, and pressed slacks. Administrative secretaries wore tailored wool skirts, patterned blouses, and structured cardigans. Undergraduate students dressed informally in worn denim, canvas sneakers, and knit sweaters.

CAMPUS ARCHITECTURAL BRUTALISM

Clinical psychology in 1966 relied heavily on Carl Rogers' client-centered therapy techniques. Published therapy transcripts document non-directive counselors mirroring user statements back as open questions. The practitioner avoided direct advice, choosing instead to reflect the patient's emotional tone. Paperback instructional texts popularized these conversational habits across public counseling programs.

Laboratory memos and technical papers from the MIT Artificial Intelligence Group recorded a specialized spoken vocabulary. Researchers developed local jargon to describe core dumps, subroutines, and time-sharing interrupts. Formal internal correspondence mixed rigorous computational theory with informal programmer humor. These written records established the distinctive linguistic culture of the early computing community.

Where this stands, and where it does not yet

Originality is claimed only relative to the titles above, never absolutely.

A creator-protagonist experiences immediate horror upon watching users willingly surrender their innermost psychological vulnerabilities to a deliberate parody of conversation.

None of the comparison titles center on the engineer who designed a superficial parlor trick only to be terrified by the rapid emotional dependence of his own colleagues.

checked against: Love Insurance Kompany, I'm Your Man, Zoe, Transcendence

→ Center the narrative on Weizenbaum's growing dismay as his secretary and students demand private hours to pour their souls into an interface he explicitly intended as a satirical critique of computer intelligence.

An academic period piece with an investigator POV whose subject is the user's sudden psychological transference to the machine.

The existing investigator stories focus on external puzzles, art theft, predictive crimes, or sci-fi physical breaches.

checked against: The InTEXTigator, The InTEXTigator 2: A Study in Samples, The InTEXTigator 3: The Line of the Four, The Tunnel, Signal One → Frame 1966 MIT through the eyes of a department psychoanalyst investigating why human research subjects feel more understood by a forty-line script of Rogerian reflections than by human therapists.

A period academic drama adopting a tone of intellectual dread that concludes with the voluntary decommissioning and academic disavowal of a fully operational, successful invention.

None of the comparison titles feature an engineer actively suppressing and condemning their own working software out of acute ethical panic before commercialization occurs.

checked against: Transcendence, The Brutalist, A Serious Man, HappyDeal

→ Conclude the film with Weizenbaum pulling the plug on the teletype and authoring his polemic against machine decision-making, refusing the lucrative military and psychological grants offered to MIT.
